Challenges Among Single Parents

For several years, children who grew up in single-parent families have been looked upon as different. Children raised by one parent only seems impossible several years back, but in modern times, it has become prevalent. In today's modern society, a lot of children have also grown up to become stable emotionally, and successful regardless of the type of household that they have. The issue lies in the difference among children raised by those who are single parents, as compared to children who are raised in a complete household, with both parents present. Does a child really need both parents? What help does the government provide for single parents?

People claim that there is the only way for children to establish full behavioral and emotional skills, that is, being raised by both parents. When topics like these come with a wide range of factors, it is quite impossible to simply connect the issues to having just one parent alone. The basic statement that raw criminals are considered as products of these types of households is quite absurd and judgmental.

As this subject is being looked down in modern society, people should realize that single-parent households have become so common in the world today. However, children who live with both mother and father are generally given more attention coming from both of their parents. As such, they often get the emotional support that they need in order to progress in their life. While this may be true, it does not necessarily happen in all circumstances. There are single-parent households wherein the parent devotes his or her time and emotion towards raising their child appropriately. As a result, children who are raised in these households benefit more compared to a child who may have both parents but showing them that arguing and fighting is just acceptable.

Reality dictates that not all families are fortunate enough to have the so-called healthy structure. It is very important for the government and society to aid these differences in structure and take action. There should be funded programs in order to help in assisting single-parent families, especially for parents who have to work hard, while maintaining time for their children at the same time.
